

PTIs and CPRCs: Resources for Parents

A publication of the National Dissemination Center for Children with Disabilities, January 2011

Barbara's Story

Barbara works for the Parent Training and Information Center (PTI) in her state. She is also the parent of a 17-year-old daughter who has multiple disabilities. Barbara loves to help other parents. She understands what they are going through. Everyday she gives many families who have children with disabilities help, hope, and a lot of information.

On this day, Barbara's first call is from a new parent who thinks her eight-month-old son may need early intervention services. Barbara gives her the number for the early intervention office in her area. She sends her information about early intervention services and about the PTI, too. She also gives her information on a local parent support group.

Carmela's Story

Carmela works in a different state at a different information center for parents. Hers is called a CPRC—a Community Parent Resource Center. Its work is similar to a PTI, but its speciality is helping Spanish-speaking families.

Today, Carmela's first call comes from a dad whose son has been struggling in school. The school wants to evaluate him for a disability. Dad wants to know what this means. He didn't understand most of the letter that came from the school, but it seemed like a long explanation of the testing process. Before he gives his consent, he wants to know more.

Carmela spends a lot of time talking with this dad. She reassures him about the testing and explains that it will help the school learn if his son has any special needs. If so, then the school will be able to provide his son with the services that can help him succeed. She explains the special education process and his child's rights. She also tells him about the CPRC's upcoming workshops and the ones that might be especially helpful to him. With this information, the dad feels more confident about having his child evaluated.

These are just two of the calls Barbara and Carmela encounter every day. Parents call PTIs and CPRCs wanting to know about disability information, educational options, school services, respite services, assistive technology, sources for funding, behavior plans, transition planning—just about anything and everything they might need to know to help their child who has a disability.

What are PTIs and CPRCs?

A Parent Training and Information Center—or PTI—is a terrific information resource for parents of children with disabilities. Every state has at least one PTI. Each one has a different name. For example, one of the PTIs in California is named Matrix Parent Network and Resource Center. The PTI in New Hampshire is called the Parent Information Center. Whatever the actual name, each is commonly known as a PTI.

Some states also have Community Parent Resource Centers, or CPRCs. CPRCs do the same work as the PTIs, but they focus on reaching underserved parents of children with disabilities, such as those living in a specific area in the state, those with low income, or those with limited English proficiency. PTIs and CPRCs are funded through our nation's special education law, the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA). As you can probably guess from their name, their purpose is to provide parents with information and training about:

- disabilities;
- parent and children’s rights under the IDEA and other relevant laws; and
- resources in the community, state, and nation.

Parent centers know about the needs of children and families. They understand school policies and practices. Through their experience with the education of children with disabilities, the needs of families and schools, parent centers make valuable contributions on a local and statewide basis in support of schools to improve services and outcomes for students with disabilities.

When would I call my PTI or CPRC?

You might call your PTI or CPRC when you have a disability-related, early intervention, special education, or transition question. The parent center can help you:

- understand your child’s disability and special needs;
- learn about the IDEA and what it means for your child;
- learn about the options, programs, services, and resources available to help your child and family;
- learn how to talk effectively to the people who work with your child;
- actively participate in making decisions about the services your child receives;
- work effectively with your child’s school to develop your child’s educational program;
- understand the benefits of mediation for resolving disagreements with your child’s school; and
- participate in school reform efforts on a local and/or statewide basis if you so choose.

Some centers may also:

- provide information to teachers and other professionals who work with children with disabilities;
- help your child understand his or her rights upon reaching the age of majority; and
- help you participate in developing your state’s improvement plan.

How do PTIs and CPRCs help parents?

Parent centers such as the PTI and CPRC mainly help parents by providing information on the phone, via email, or through a website. You have a question, the PTI/CPRC tries to answer it. They may refer you to other helpful organizations in your community or offer practical advice.

Centers are run by well-trained and knowledgeable staff. Most have children with disabilities themselves. They answer the phone prepared to hear your concerns and issues. Most have one main office with a toll-free telephone number, so that parents can call free of charge from anywhere in the state. Many publish newsletters and other written materials. They may also provide these materials in other languages based upon the needs of families in the community. Many PTIs have several offices around the state.

Parent centers put major effort into conducting workshops, conferences, and seminars for parents. In these training sessions, parents can learn about IDEA, the special education process, recommended practices, and much, much more. Often, PTI and CPRC staff serve on different local and state level advisory councils, boards, or work groups that are designed to improve results for students with disabilities and enhance home-school-community partnerships. Some centers also extend their training and information services to professionals who work with children with disabilities and their families.

As you know, dealing with many issues at one time can be overwhelming. An experienced staff member at the PTI or CPRC can help you sort through the issues and put them in perspective.

Together, you can brainstorm strategies and possible solutions. What questions need to be asked? Of whom? What information or training would be helpful? What does the law say? The PTI/CPRC can help you address your unique concerns, and expand and build upon your knowledge and strengths.

Most centers have limited resources and don't go to school meetings to advocate for you and your child. Some centers do go to meetings, mainly to offer support to parents. Most often, the PTI/CPRC gives you the skills and confidence to negotiate for your child on your own. This helps you get your child the services needed to reach his or her full potential.

Will I have to pay for services?

Most services are free to parents. However, there may be some services where the PTI/CPRC does charge a fee. Parents should ask about any costs for services when they contact the center.

My son has a disability. Can the PTI or CPRC help me find resources to help him?

Absolutely. Depending upon your needs, the PTI or CPRC can usually:

- tell you about any upcoming workshops related to your son's disability;
- help you develop your negotiation skills, so you're sure his needs are addressed in his Individualized Education Program (IEP);
- put you in touch with available parent support groups;
- recommend articles, books, videos, and organizations;
- share information on resources and supports available from the school system, community, state, and national centers;
- give you a list of tutors, special schools, or programs for children with disabilities; and
- refer you to educational consultants or specialists, so you can learn more about what your child needs.

We just moved to this state. Our son needs special education services. We have his old IEP with us. Can the PTI or CPRC help us?

Sure. First, the parent center will probably ask you some questions to get a picture of your situation. For example: Where do you live now? (This will tell the center what school district you're in.) What are the dates on your son's IEP? (This will tell the center if the IEP is current or not.)

What kind of services was your son receiving in your old state? (This will tell the center what types of services your son needs.)

The PTI or CPRC will probably share a lot of information with you. They may talk a bit about the law. Both federal and state regulations have requirements for schools when a child moves into the state with an IEP from another state. The center will want to make sure you understand what those requirements are.

With all this information, the PTI or CPRC should be able to direct you to the right school office. They can also advise you on how to use your son's existing IEP. This will be useful when you meet with staff at his new school. And you can always call the center back if you need more information in the future.

My daughter has been receiving special education services for two years, but I'm not sure she's getting all that she needs. How can the PTI or CPRC help me?

There are several ways the PTI and CPRC can help you. First, the center may invite you to one of its workshops on the special education law, IDEA. There, you'll learn more about the rights of children with disabilities under the law. And you'll gain more understanding on how the special education process is designed to work. This information will help you work with the school system. The parent center may also recommend workshops that target areas such as:

- How to Develop Your Child's IEP
- Collaborating with Your Child's School
- How to Advocate for Your Child
- What Do You Do When Home-School Communication Breaks Down?

Many PTIs and CPRCs have lending libraries of books and videos. They may also suggest specific organizations or specialists working in the area of your daughter's disability.

The PTI/CPRC may offer to review your child's school records with you. Together, you can see if anything is unclear or appears to be missing.

If it seems that more information on your child is needed, the center will give you some ideas on how to talk with the school about gathering this information.

If, indeed, your daughter does need more services, the center can be particularly helpful. They know a great deal about how to work with school systems. They can help you explore options and develop a strategy for working with your daughter's school. This includes how to talk to your daughter's school about her need for more services. The center can also tell you what other options are available to you, if you and the school cannot agree.

And always, the PTI and CPRC will be there to provide you with follow-up support, information, and advice. Advocating for your child is a long-term commitment. PTIs and CPRCs are there to help you and your child.

Finding Your Parent Center

To find your PTI and/or CPRC, please visit the Center for Parent Information and Resources (CPIR), at:

<http://www.parentcenterhub.org/find-your-center>

The CPIR also has a Repository of Resources that you can explore. There, you can connect with publications on a wide range of topics of interest to parents, including:

Questions often asked by parents about special education services
<http://www.parentcenterhub.org/repository/lg1/>

Developing your child's IEP
<http://www.parentcenterhub.org/repository/pa12>

Parental rights under IDEA
<http://www.parentcenterhub.org/repository/parental-rights/>

To our PTI and CPRC friends and colleagues—
Thanks for all your hard work and longstanding commitment to parents and children!

This publication is copyright free. Readers are encouraged to copy and share it. Its publication is made possible through a Cooperative Agreement between FHI 360 and the Office of Special Education Programs of the U.S. Department of Education. The contents of this document do not necessarily reflect the views or policies of the Department of Education, nor does mention of trade names, commercial products, or organizations imply endorsement by the U.S. Government.